Course Description

This elective course teaches social policy concepts and practices in a comparative perspective. It critically examines major social policy challenges confronting societies in Asia. A key feature of this course is that social welfare issues are addressed through case examples and accompanied by concrete analyses based on policy practices of societies in the region. Adopting a comparative approach in analyzing social policy design and implementation, this course will enable students to understand the most recent developments related to poverty alleviation, health care, labour protection, social security, and public housing policies in Mainland China, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Singapore. Students will engage in comparing and contrasting major social welfare issues with the purpose of understanding their underlying dynamics and devising appropriate responses.

Course Objectives

Students who successfully undertake this course will:

- Understand the concepts and approaches of social policy studies.
- Appreciate the value of social welfare policies to human dignity and development.
- Be equipped with useful analytical skills in examining poverty alleviation, health, labour protection, old-age protection, and public housing policies.
- Compare and contrast the policy strategies of governments in Asia in promoting social development and make assessment.
